ABOUT COMMUNITY CONNECTIONS

This publication has a brand new look. What was once called the UCC quarterly class schedule is now called UCC Community Connections.

For the past several years, the college has mailed the class schedule to roughly 50,000 homes in Douglas County as our way of informing the public what we offer. As technology has changed, so has our way of reaching the community. A few years ago we made the printed schedule that you receive in your mailbox available online. The schedule is the second most-read source on the UCC website, so we know how important it is for this information to be accessible and current.

SPOTLIGHT ON ALUMNI SUCCESS 4

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT CENTER 24-25

In changing to this new publication, we've moved our college "credit class" schedule completely online. The students in our community will always have access to the most up-to-date credit class schedule additions and changes — something we weren't able to provide when the schedule was in print. The online schedule can be accessed 24/7 at umpqua.edu/class-schedule.

GETTING STARTED 5

So what's here? You'll still find the schedule and information for Community and Workforce Training, Small Business Development Center, and Adult Basic Skills as well as information on Registration and a calendar of UCC's Arts and Athletics events. In addition, we'll share stories about students, outstanding alumni, and community partners who join us in academic excellence.

Learning Through a Different Lens

“Communicating effectively was really hard for me. I decided to go back to school because I wanted to improve my English.” – Sophavid Choum-Starkey

Many people take the ability to communicate in English for granted. Reading, writing, and speaking English are just things most people who live in Douglas County can easily do. But for some people, it takes a great deal of effort and determination to even begin to learn English. For nearly two years, Sophavid Choum-Starkey has been learning through a different lens. What started as a simple goal to fit in with the community has led the Umpqua Community College (UCC) student to find her purpose and direction in life. Sophavid’s journey to Oregon was less than traditional. She was born in Cambodia — a country that endured the Khmer Rouge Regime in the late half of the 1970s. During that time, around two million Cambodians starved to death or were executed. Sophavid’s parents survived. Following the regime’s reign, they continued to live as farmers. Dedicated to raising their crops and animals, they never completed school. Today, their educational dreams live in their children.

“My dad is really happy I am doing this because he also didn’t get a chance to do it,” she said. “He always wanted his children to do better, so he is proud of my decision.”

About 10 years ago, Sophavid played video games. In her words, it was something she “tried and did as a kid.” During that time, she worked at a nonprofit organization in Cambodia that helped restore sight to the blind; video games were simply a hobby. While playing, she happened to connect with a man who lived in California. Over the course of several years, the two became friends. He taught her English and helped her with writing. One day, he asked her a question.

“I was driving down the road and he asked me to marry him,” she said. “He had asked me a few times before and I thought he was kidding. But this time, I finally said yes.”

By the time they got married in 2018, her husband had moved back home to Roseburg. After joining him here, the culture shock hit. For the next six months, Sophavid stayed in her house. One day, a class schedule from UCC arrived in her mailbox. She discovered UCC’s Woolley Center and its English Language Acquisition (ELA) courses inside.

“I had difficulty talking to people,” she said. “Communicating effectively was really hard for me. I decided to go back to school because I wanted to improve my English.”

Sophavid discovered a lot more than language skills at the Woolley Center’s Harvard Avenue location. A pre-test showed she was beyond ELA courses; she was ready to work on a GED. While the price was right for her at $20 per class, what she needed next was courage and a lot of it.

“I cried on my first day of writing class because I didn’t know about many things in this country,” she said. “I only knew about America through movies at that time. For me to blend into the culture, I needed an understanding and the GED program helped me do that.”

Finding her Voice in Journalism

“Media literacy and learning how to read critically are some of the most important skills a person can learn.”

– Renee Thompson,
UCC Alumna, Class of 2018

In the winter of 2017, Renee Thompson joined Umpqua Community College’s student newspaper, The Mainstream, as a reporter and graphic designer. Thompson, an art, advertising, and psychology major, was dissatisfied with the information she learned about advertising in a business course. When friends and teachers suggested she consider taking a journalism course to fill her desire for advertising knowledge, she was hesitant at first.

“It wasn’t until my partner Logan suggested we take it together that I finally got the courage to sign up,” Thompson said. “I [was] diagnosed with anxiety at 18, so going into college there were a lot of things I had to change for my own well-being.”

As part of The Mainstream team, Thompson worked closely with a group of fellow students to produce bi-monthly publications for UCC’s campus. Through her experiences as a student journalist and with encouragement from adviser Melinda Benton, Thompson was able to connect with a community of peers, increase her confidence, and find her voice.

“I was hesitant at first because I’m kind of a shy person,” Thompson said. “The thought of making something that was going to be seen by that many people intimidated me a little. But after meeting Melinda, I knew it was the right place for me.”

After taking one term of journalism, Thompson fell in love with writing and took another journalism course, Introduction to Mass Communication, in spring 2017. She continued to work for The Mainstream until she graduated in spring 2018.

Part of an award-winning team, Thompson covered a variety of subjects from comic books to students’ financial concerns, including the first-ever special edition on the #MeToo movement. “I felt that it was a subject we needed to talk about,” she said. “I did a story on male survivors of sexual violence and it was really interesting to be working with so many awesome writers. I remember going around the table at our first meeting and talking about all our ideas. It really taught me that journalism can be a powerful commentator on the world around us.”

Thompson was accepted to the University of Oregon in spring 2018. She has continued her studies there in advertising, journalism, and psychology. She currently works as the copy editor for U of O’s Art Ducko Magazine and recently got a job at Green Eugene Magazine, which she attributes to taking UCC’s journalism courses.

“I couldn’t be more grateful I took the class, because there really is no better way to improve your writing and design skills than jumping into projects headfirst,” she said. “It’s important to train reporters to be unbiased and report how facts are established in order to positively influence the world, even if it’s on a small scale. I would say that media literacy and learning how to read critically are some of the most important skills a person can learn.”

She encourages others to “take journalism classes because [they] can teach [people] how to think critically about all the media they’ll come into contact with [during] their academic careers.”

Through the program, Sophavid's confidence grew. She learned about government, American history, economics, and much more.

"The benefit of a GED as an immigrant was crucial," she said. "All of it gave me the contextual information about this country that I needed."

After completing the GED program in one year, Sophavid immediately enrolled at UCC as a degree-seeking student. She also applied for a job as a work-study student and became instantly immersed in UCC's Office of Communications and Marketing, where she continues to expand her writing and speaking skills.

"I get to learn so much more in my job that I did not expect," she said. "I always learn about technology, digital marketing, writing, and photography. On top of doing our jobs and being busy, we always help students, too. This experience helps me see a better future. It's not the money [I earn] that keeps me going. This is where I can strengthen my skills and see myself in the future."

While Sophavid continues with her studies and dedicates time to her work, her parents and husband continue to support her efforts to grow and earn a college degree.

"I am not only doing this for myself. I am doing this for them, too, because they did not get to," she said. "Going to college gave me sense of purpose and direction. Through this journey, I have been evolving. When I see others going through the same things I went through, I can now reach out and let them know what's available."

Greetings:

Together, we are facing a truly unprecedented time. The team at UCC Community and Workforce Training wants to share how we are approaching Personal and Professional Development classes in the months to come.

While we would love to deliver many of our classes, workshops, and conferences in-person, the current circumstances necessitate continued social distancing. Our class coordinators, in collaboration with our instructors, are transitioning many of our classes to virtual led instruction using Zoom or Online delivery. While this is new and challenging, we are committed to the interactive and hands-on nature of our classes. Our instructors will be accessible to answer your questions, engage with you, and provide an opportunity for interaction between students. We may not be in the physical classroom in the near future, however, we pledge to provide you with a valuable and unique learning experience.

We encourage you to take the leap into online learning with us! Several free classes are available to you this summer focused on utilizing Zoom, maintaining your health and working remotely.

Sincerely,

Your UCC Community & Workforce Training Team
